

Shooting at the Slow Manifold

Ferdinand Verhulst (UU)

We revisit singularly perturbed two-point boundary value problems with the aim of answering and formulating questions. The use of a shooting method enables us to identify slow manifolds and canard behaviour. This adds insight but also raises problems. A computational aspect is that matching in these problems is much more efficient than multiple scaling methods.